

APPRECIATING DIVERSITY FILM SERIES

ADFS will celebrate the days leading up to Martin Luther King's birthday with two films that focus on the ways American institutions and policies advantage some groups at the expense of others.

The House We Live In

focuses on immigration and housing, and shows how American laws and policies have resulted in dramatically different treatment for whites and all other races. For example, post WWII red-lining limited investment in cities, at the same time that people of color were discriminated against in suburban housing. The film describes how these policies have affected wealth disparities between whites and people of color today.

The Arc of Justice traces the path of black farmers in Georgia, who, after the Civil Rights Movement, formed a community land trust to cooperatively farm more than 6,000 acres. They fight through opposition to their building low cost housing, crippling drought, and then denial of government loans that their white neighbors received. Come see how their lawsuit against the government demonstrates the importance of our rule of law.
